Market Review

At the beginning of the month, the longer part of the yield curve in the US accelerated its rise it had initiated in November last year. This move made many investors nervous provoking lemmings-like reactions. The VIX index (a key measure of market expectations of near-term volatility) all of a sudden surged to intraday levels not seen since 2008 and 2015, while global equity markets retreated. Markets feared an overheating of the US economy with inflation getting out of control. The Fed indeed voiced a slightly more hawkish tone under the lead of its new chair Mr J. Powell, but fears of a Fed running behind the curve were somewhat tempered by some macro-indicators coming in lower than expected.

Over the month, equity markets were all down without exception. The Japanese Topix fell 3.7%, the S&P500 lost 3.9%, the Europe Stoxx 600 Index was down 4% and emerging markets (MSCI) dropped 4.7%.

As the US 10 Year Treasury yield rose from 2.70%, beginning of the month, to 2.86%, end of the month, European Sovereign bonds initially followed but the latter finally ended the month almost at their initial levels. European investment grade bonds (IBOXX Euro Liquid Corporates Total Return Index) were roughly flat (-0.07%), while high yielding bonds (Markit iBoxx EUR Liquid High Yield Index TRI) dropped 0.61%, reflecting the risk aversion move that took place during the month.

In the currencies market, the euro lost momentum versus the USD and especially the JPY, which gained 1.80% and 4.19% respectively. In the commodities universe, crude oil prices decreased significantly (-5.60% for the Brent) following some inventories built-up in the US.

Portfolio Performance

During the month, the Fund dropped 1.70%, with its Foreign Currency exposure being the sole positive contributor. The fixed income part of the Fund was little down, as our short duration profile contributed slightly negative. The main detractor clearly was its equity exposure, with all major stock markets down during the month.

As inflationary pressures were not as strong as initially feared by market participants, duration profile of the Fixed income part was slightly increased from 2.9 to 3.3.

Market Outlook

The period of repricing after decades of accommodative monetary policies has just begun, so we expect more episodes such as the past month. However, the overall direction for Equity Markets is still up, as both the fundamental macro-economic picture and corporate results remain positive. Analysts, for instance, have increased their full-year earnings per share growth guidance by 7.3% for the S&P 500 index since beginning of the year. This is the largest increase in at least 20 years.

On the fixed income, we continue to be prudent relative to the risk of increasing interest rates, by keeping overall duration profile low and remain constructive on inflation linked sovereign bonds.
