Monthly summary report | as at 30 November 2021

Market Review

November started on a positive note. Corporate earnings season ended strongly, while macro-economic indicators continued to surprise positively, indicating that the fourth quarter should be solid. Europe was experiencing a surge in Covid occurrences but Asia was fairing rather well on that front which alleviated some supply-chain concerns. It all pointed to calmer waters for the remainder of the year. Unfortunately, we woke up on Friday 26th of November to learn that a new strain of the Coronavirus had been discovered in South Africa. Unlike other mutations, this one was different enough to create significant new concerns regarding transmissibility and, more importantly, vaccine efficiency. Consequently, the last three trading days of the month were rather volatile as investors tried to assess the implications of this new mutation and the impact of the global recovery. The Euro Stoxx 50 lost 4.4% during the month, while the S&P 500 retreated to a lesser extent (-0.8%). Emerging markets were also hit, shedding 4.1% in November.

In the fixed income market, we witnessed a flight to safety as haven assets, such as government bonds, performed. Indeed, the 10-year German Bund yield fell sharply from -0.10% to -0.35%. Even in the US, where the central bank is more hawkish, long term bonds, such as the 10-year US treasuries, saw their yields drop (from 1.55% to 1.45%). With the appearance of Omicron, the Federal Reserve's language has clearly changed. Powell indicated that this variant could affect growth and employment, and intensify supply chain disruptions. While the Fed had initially made the exit from its accommodative monetary policy conditional to a return to full employment, Omicron made US central bank's task more complicated. During his last speech to the senate, Powell indicated that the US economy is very strong and that high inflationary pressures now justify accelerating the reduction of its asset purchase program.

Portfolio Performance

During the month, the fund has lost 0.44%. Amid renewed concerns regarding the coronavirus, equities have been the main drag to the performance. However, given strong performance from safe haven assets, the overall performance is only slightly negative. Indeed, we have benefitted from falling interest rates on the fixed income part of the portfolio on the one hand, and strong performances from the US dollar and the Japanese Yen on the other hand.

We have decided to slightly reduce the overall equity exposure to 53% mainly through European stocks. Indeed, we have mainly reduced tactical positions in value plays such as the energy and the financials sectors that could suffer in the current context. Parallely, we have increased exposure to the health care sector, particularly to the covid-related sub-sector.

What is more, we have decided to introduce gold in the portfolio as a hedge against renewed uncertainty linked to the surge in inflation and the health situation.

Market Outlook

Volatility has returned to the markets with many questions remaining to be answered, Omicron being the main topic. While we believe that it should not turn out to be an end-of-the-world moment, investors could still experience some turbulence in their portfolios in the following weeks. We have adjusted the portfolio for a wait and see period and will act further if need be. Structurally we remain positive on long term themes, such as digitalization and health care for instance, that should better sustain inflation, monetary policy shifts as well as pandemic bursts.
